Dans le chapitre qui précède, j'avais analysé la version du socialisme des marxistes orthodoxes. —ce qu'on a appelé le socialisme soviétique, et développé la description de ses effets sur le processus de production et sur l'ordre moral de la société. J'avais continué en soulignant que les conséquences d'un appauvrissement relatif —conséquences que les théoriciens avaient prévues— s'étaient révélées si puissantes qu'en réalité, une politique de socialisation de tous les moyens de production ne pouvait être effectivement menée jusqu'à sa conséquence ultime : la socialisation de tous les facteurs de production, sans causer immédiatement un désastre économique. En fait, à un moment ou à un autre, toutes les mises en oeuvres effectives du socialisme marxiste ont dû réintroduire des éléments de propriété privée des moyens de production pour surmonter ou pour prévenir une faillite trop visible. Cependant, même un socialisme "modéré" ne peut empêcher un appauvrissement relatif de la population tant que l'idée d'une production socialisée n'est pas entièrement abandonnée, une bonne fois pour toutes.

Much more so than any theoretical argument, it has been the disappointing experience with Russian-type socialism which has led to a constant decline in the popularity of orthodox Marxist socialism and has spurred the emergence and development of modern social-democratic socialism, which will be the concern of this chapter. Both types of socialism, to be sure, derive from the same ideological sources. Both are egalitarian in motivation, at least in theory, and both have essentially the same ultimate goal: the abolishment of capitalism as a social system based on private ownership and the establishment of a new society, characterized by brotherly solidarity and the eradication of scarcity; a society in which everyone is paid "according to his needs." From the very beginnings of the socialist movement in the mid-nineteenth century, though, there have been conflicting ideas on the methods best suited for achieving these goals. While generally there was agreement on the necessity of socializing the means of production, there were always diverging opinions on how to proceed. On the one hand, within the socialist movement there were the advocates of a revolutionary course of action. They propagated the violent overthrow of the existing governments, the complete expropriation of all capitalists in one stroke, and the temporary (i.e., until scarcity would indeed, as promised, be eradicated) dictatorship of the proletariat, i.e., of those who were not capitalists but who had to sell their labor services, in order to stabilize the new order. On the other hand there were the reformists who advocated a gradualist approach. They reasoned that with the enlargement of the franchise, and ultimately with a system of universal suffrage, socialism's victory could be attained through democratic, parliamentary action. This would be so because capitalism, according to common socialist doctrine, would bring about a tendency towards the proletarization of society, i.e., a tendency for fewer people to be self-employed and more to become employees instead. And in accordance with common socialist beliefs, this tendency would in turn produce an increasingly uniform proletarian class consciousness which then would lead to a swelling voter turnout for the socialist party. And, so they reasoned, as this strategy was much more in line with public opinion (more appealing to the mostly peacefully-minded workers and at the same time less frightening to the capitalists), by adopting it, socialism's ultimate success would only become more assured.

Both of these forces co-existed within the socialist movement, though their relationship was at times quite strained, until the Bolshevik Revolution of October, 1917 in Russia. In practice, the socialist movement generally took the reformist path, while in the field of ideological debate the revolutionaries dominated. The Russian events changed this. With Lenin in the lead, for the first time the revolutionary socialists realized their program and the socialist movement as a whole had to take a stand vis a vis the Russian experiment. As a consequence, the socialist movement split into two branches with two separate parties: a communist party either more or less in favor of the Russian events, and a socialist or social-democratic party with reservations, or against them. Still, the split was not over the issue of socialization; both were in favor of that. It was an open split over the issue of revolutionary vs. democratic parliamentary change. Faced with the actual experience of the Russian revolution —the violence, the bloodshed, the practice of uncontrolled expropriation, the fact that thousands of new leaders, very often of questionable reputation or simply shady, inferior characters, were being swept to the political helm—the social democrats, in their attempt to gain public support, felt they had to abandon their revolutionary image and become, not only in practice but in theory as well, a decidedly reformist, democratic party. And even some of the communist parties of the West, dedicated as they were to a theory of revolutionary change, but just as much in need of public support, felt they had to find some fault, at least, with the peculiar Bolshevik way of implementing the revolution. They, too, increasingly thought it necessary to play the reformist, democratic game, if only in practice.

However, this was only the first step in the transformation of the socialist movement effected by the experience of the Russian revolution. The next step, as indicated, was forced upon it by the dim experience with Soviet Russia's economic performance. Regardless of their differing views on the desirability of revolutionary changes and equally unfamiliar with or unable or unwilling to grasp abstract economic reasoning, socialists and communists alike could still, during a sort of honeymoon period which they felt the new experiment deserved, entertain the most illusory hopes about the economic achievements of a policy of socialization. But this period could not last forever, and the facts had to be faced and the results evaluated after some time had elapsed. For every decently neutral observer of things, and later for every alert visitor and traveler, it became evident that socialism soviétique did not mean more but rather less wealth and that it was a system above all, that in having to allow even small niches of private capital formation, had in fact already admitted its own economic inferiority, if only implicitly. As this experience became more widely known, and in particular when after World War II the Soviet experiment was repeated in the East European countries, producing the very same dim results and thus disproving the thesis that the Soviet mess was only due to a special Asian mentality of the people, in their race for public support the socialist, i.e., the social-democratic and communist, parties of the West were forced to modify their programs further. The communists now saw various flaws in the Russian implementation of the socialization program as well, and increasingly toyed with the idea of more decentralized planning and decision-making and of partial socialization, i.e., socialization only of major firms and industries, although they never entirely abandoned the idea of socialized production. The socialist or social-democratic parties, on the other hand, less sympathetic from the beginning towards the Russian model of socialism and through their decidedly reformist-democratic policy already inclined to accept compromises such as partial socialization, had to make a further adaptive move. These parties, in response to the Russian and East European experiences, increasingly gave up the notion of socialized production altogether and instead put more and more emphasis on the idea of income taxation and equalization, and, in another move, on equalization of opportunity, as being the true cornerstones of socialism.

While this shift from Russian-type socialism towards a socialdemocratic one took place, and still is taking place in all Western societies, it was not equally strong everywhere. Roughly speaking and only looking at Europe, the displacement of the old by the new kind of socialism has been more pronounced, the more immediate and direct the experience with Russian-type socialism for the population in which the socialist and/or communist parties had to find supporters and voters. Of all the major countries, in West Germany, where the contact with this type of socialism is the most direct, where millions of people still have ample opportunities to see with their own eyes the mischief that has been done to the people in East Germany, this displacement was the most complete. Here, in 1959, the social democrats adopted (or rather were forced by public opinion to adopt) a new party program in which all obvious traces of a Marxist past were conspicuously absent, that rather explicitly mentioned the importance of private ownership and markets, that talked about socialization only as a mere possibility, and that instead heavily stressed the importance of redistributive measures. Here, the protagonists of a policy of socialization of the means of production within the social-democratic party have been considerably outnumbered ever since; and here the communist parties, even when they are only in favor of peaceful and partial socialization, have been reduced to insignificance.5 In countries further removed from the iron curtain, like France, Italy, Spain, and also Great Britain, this change has been less dramatic. Nonetheless, it is safe to say that today only social-democratic socialism, as represented most typically by the German social-democrats, can claim widespread popularity in the West. As a matter of fact, due partly to the influence of the Socialist International—the association of socialist and social-democratic parties—social-democratic socialism can now be said to be one of the most widespread ideologies of our age, increasingly shaping the political programs and actual policies not only of explicitly socialist parties, and to a lesser degree those of the western communists, but also of groups and parties who would not even in their most far-fetched dreams call themselves socialists, like the east coast "liberal" Democrats in the United States.6 And in the field of international politics the 6 Indicators for the social-democratization of the socialist movement are the rise of the socialist party and the corresponding decline of the orthodox communist party in France; the emergence of a social-democratic party as a rival to the more orthodox labour party in Great Britain; the moderation of the communists in Italy as the only remaining powerful communist party in Western Europe toward an increasingly social-democratic policy; and the growth of the socialist-social-democratic parties in Spain and Portugal under Gonzales and Soares, both with close ties to the German SPD.

ideas of social-democratic socialism, in particular of a redistributive approach towards the so-called North-South conflict, have almost become something like the official position among all "well-informed" and "well-intentioned" men; a consensus extending far beyond those who think of themselves as socialists.7

What are the central features of socialism social-democratic-style? There are basically two characteristics. First, in positive contradistinction to the traditional Marxist-style socialism, social-democratic socialism does not outlaw private ownership in the means of production and it even accepts the idea of all means of production being privately owned —with the exception only of education, traffic and communication, central banking, and the police and courts. In principle, everyone has the right to privately appropriate and own means of production, to sell, buy, or newly produce them, to give them away as a present, or to rent them out to someone else under a contractual arrangement. But secondly, no owner of means of production rightfully owns all of the income that can be derived from the usage of his means of production and no owner is left to decide how much of the total income from production to allocate to consumption and investment. Instead, part of the income from production rightfully belongs to society, has to be handed over to it, and is then, according to ideas of egalitarianism or distributive justice, redistributed to its individual members. Furthermore, though the respective income-shares that go to the producer and to society might be fixed at any given point in time, the share that rightfully belongs to the producer is in principle flexible and the determination of its size, as well as that of society's share, is not up to the producer, but rightfully belongs to society.8

Seen from the point of view of the natural theory of property —the theory underlying capitalism— the adoption of these rules implies that the rights of the natural owner have been aggressively invaded. According to this theory of property, it should be recalled, the user-owner of the means of production may do whatever he wants with them; and whatever the outcome of his usage. it is his own private income, which he can use again as he pleases, as long as he does not change the physical integrity of someone else's property and exclusively relies on contractual exchanges. From the standpoint of the natural theory of property, there are not two separate processes —the production of income and then, after income is produced, its distribution. There is only one process: in producing income it is automatically distributed; the producer is the owner. As compared with this, socialism social-democratic style advocates the partial expropriation of the natural owner by redistributing part of the income from production to people who, whatever their merits otherwise, definitely did not produce the income in question and definitely did not have any contractual claims to it, and who, in addition, have the right to determine unilaterally, i.e., without having to wait for the affected producer's consent, how far this partial expropriation can go.

Furthermore, the socialist parties of Scandinavia, which traditionally had closely followed the German path and which later provided safe haven to a number of prominent socialists during the Nazi persecution (most notably W. Brandt and B. Kreisky), have long given credence to the revisionist beliefs.

8 Note again that this characterization of social-democratic socialism has the status of an "ideal type" (cf. Chapter 3, n. 2). It is not to be taken as a description of the policy or ideology of any actual party. Rather, it should be understood as the attempt to reconstruct what has become the essence of modern social-democratic style socialism, underlying a much more diverse reality of programs and policies of various parties or movements of different names as the ideologically unifying core.

It should be clear from this description that, contrary to the impression which socialism social-democratic style is intended to generate among the public, the difference between both types of socialism is not of a categorical nature. Rather, it is only a matter of degree. Certainly, the first mentioned rule seems to inaugurate a fundamental difference in that it allows private ownership. But then the second rule in principle allows the expropriation of all of the producer's income from production and thus reduces his ownership right to a purely nominal one. Of course, social-democratic socialism does not have to go as far as reducing private ownership to one in name only. And admittedly, as the income-share that the producer is forced to hand over to society can in fact be quite moderate, this, in practice, can make a tremendous difference as regards economic performance. But still, it must be realized that from the standpoint of the nonproducing fellowmen, the degree of expropriation of private producers' income is a matter of expediency, which suffices to reduce the difference between both types of socialism —Russian and social-democratic style— once and for all to a difference only of degree. It should be apparent what this important fact implies for a producer. It means that however low the presently fixed degree of expropriation might be, his productive efforts take place under the ever-present threat that in the future the income-share which must be handed over to society will be raised unilaterally. It does not need much comment to see how this increases the risk, or the cost of producing, and hence lowers the rate of investment.

With this statement a first step in the analysis that follows has already been taken. What are the economic, in the colloquial sense of the term, consequences of adopting a system of social-democratic socialism? After what has just been said, it is probably no longer altogether surprising to hear that at least as regards the general direction of the effects, they are quite similar to those of traditional Marxist-type socialism. Still, to the extent that socialdemocratic socialism settles for partial expropriation and the redistribution of producer incomes, some of the impoverishment effects that result from a policy of fully socializing means of production can be circumvented. Since these resources can still be bought and sold, the problem most typical of a caretaker economy—that no market prices for means of production exist and hence neither monetary calculation nor accounting are possible, with ensuing misallocations and the waste of scarce resources in usages that are at best of only secondary importance—is avoided. In addition, the problem of overutilization is at least reduced. Also, since private investment and capital formation is still possible to the extent that some portion of income from production is left with the producer to use at his discretion, under socialism social-democratic style there is a relatively higher incentive to work, to save, and to invest.

Nonetheless, by no means can all impoverishment effects be avoided. Socialism social-democratic style, however good it might look in comparison with Russian-type socialism, still necessarily leads to a reduction in investment and thus in future wealth as compared with that under capitalism.9 By taking part of the income from production away from the owner-producer, however small that part may be, and giving it to people who did not produce the income in question, the costs of production (which are never zero, as producing, appropriating, contractings always imply at least the use of time, which could be used otherwise, for leisure, consumption, or underground work, for instance) rise, and, mutatis mutandis, the costs of nonproducing and/or underground production fall, however slightly. As a consequence there will be relatively less production and investment, even though, for reasons to be discussed shortly, the absolute level of production and wealth might still rise. There will be relatively more leisure, more consumption, and more moonlighting, and hence, all in all, relative impoverishment. And this tendency will be more pronounced the higher the income from production that is redistributed, and the more imminent the likelihood that it will be raised in the future by unilateral, noncontractual societal decision.

For a long time by far the most popular idea for implementing the general policy goal of social-democratic socialism was to redistribute monetary income by means of income taxation or a general sales tax levied on producers. A look at this particular technique shall further clarify our point and avoid some frequently encountered misunderstandings and misconceptions about the general effect of relative impoverishment. What is the economic effect of introducing income or sales taxation where there has been none before, or of raising an existing level of taxation to a new height?10 In answering this, I will further ignore the complications that result from the different possible ways of redistributing tax money to different individuals or groups of individuals — these shall be discussed later in this chapter.

Here we will only take into account the general fact, true by definition for all redistributive systems, that any redistribution of tax money is a transfer from monetary income producers and contractual money recipients to people in their capacity as nonproducers and nonrecipients of contractual money incomes. Introducing or raising taxation thus implies that monetary income flowing from production is reduced for the producer and increased for people in their roles as nonproducers and noncontractors. This changes the relative costs of production for monetary return versus nonproduction and production for nonmonetary returns. Accordingly, insofar as this change is perceived by people, they will increasingly resort to leisurely consumption and/or production for the purpose of barter, simultaneously reducing their productive efforts undertaken for monetary rewards. In any case, the output of goods to be purchased with money will fall, which is to say the purchasing power of money decreases, and hence the general standard of living will decline.

Against this reasoning it is sometimes argued that it has been frequently observed empirically that a rise in the level of taxation was actually accompanied by a rise (not a fall) in the gross national product (GNP), and that the above reasoning, however plausible, must thus be considered empirically invalid. This alleged counter-argument exhibits a simple misunderstanding: a confusion between absolute and relative reduction. In the above analysis the conclusion is reached that the effect of higher taxes is a relative reduction in production for monetary returns; a reduction, that is, as compared with the level of production that would have been attained had the degree of taxation not been altered. It does not say or imply anything with respect to the absolute level of output produced. As a matter of fact, absolute growth of GNP is not only compatible with our analysis but can be seen as a perfectly normal phenomenon to the extent that advances in productivity are possible and actually take place. If it has become possible, through improvement in the technology of production, to produce a higher output with an identical input (in terms of costs), or a physically identical output with a reduced input, then the coincidence of increased taxation and increased output is anything but surprising. But, to be sure, this does not at all affect the validity of what has been stated about relative impoverishment resulting from taxation.

Another objection that enjoys some popularity is that raising taxes leads to a reduction in monetary income, and that this reduction raises the marginal utility of money as compared with other forms of income (like leisure) and thus, instead of lowering it, actually helps to increase the tendency to work for monetary return. This observation, to be sure, is perfectly true. But it is a misconception to believe that it does anything to invalidate the relative impoverishment thesis. First of all, in order to get the full picture it should be noted that through taxation, not only the monetary income for some people (the producers) is reduced but simultaneously monetary income for other people (nonproducers) is increased, and for these people the marginal utility of money and hence their inclination to work for monetary return would be reduced. But this is by no means all that need be said, as this might still leave the impression that taxation simply does not affect the output of exchangeable goods at all--since it will reduce the marginal utility of money income for some and increase it for others, with both effects cancelling each other out. But this impression would be wrong. As a matter of fact, this would be a denial of what has been assumed at the outset: that a tax hike, i.e., a higher monetary contribution forced upon disapproving income producers, has actually taken place and has been perceived as such--and would hence involve a logical contradiction. Intuitively, the flaw in the belief that taxation is "neutral" as regards output becomes apparent as soon as the argument is carried to its ultimate extreme. It would then amount to the statement that even complete expropriation of all of the producers' monetary income and the transfer of it to a group of nonproducers would not make any difference, since the increased laziness of the nonproducers resulting from this redistribution would be fully compensated by an increased workaholism on the part of the producers (which is certainly absurd). What is overlooked in this sort of reasoning is that the introduction of taxation or the rise in any given level of taxation does not only imply favoring nonproducers at the expense of producers, it also simultaneously changes, for producers and nonproducers of monetary income alike, the cost attached to different methods of achieving an (increasing) monetary income. For it is now relatively less costly to attain additional monetary income through nonproductive means, i.e., not through actually producing more goods but by participating in the process of noncontractual acquisitions of goods already produced. Even if producers are indeed more intent upon attaining additional money as a consequence of a higher tax, they will increasingly do so not by intensifying their productive efforts but rather through exploitative methods. This explains why taxation is not, and never can be, neutral. With (increased) taxation a different legal incentive structure is institutionalized: one that changes the relative costs of production for monetary income versus nonproduction, including nonproduction for leisurely purposes and nonproduction for monetary return, and also versus production for nonmonetary return (barter). And if such a different incentive structure is applied to one and the same population, then, and necessarily so, a decrease in the output of goods produced for monetary return must result.\footnote{In addition, it should not be overlooked that even if it led to increased work by those taxed, a higher degree of taxation would in any case reduce the amount of leisure available to them and thereby reduce their standard of living. Cf. M.N.}
While income and sales taxation are the most common techniques, they do not exhaust social-democratic socialism's repertoire of redistributive methods. No matter how the taxes are redistributed to the individuals composing a given society, no matter, for instance, to what extent monetary income is equalized, since these individuals can and do lead different lifestyles and since they allocate different portions of the monetary income assigned to them to consumption or to the formation of nonproductively used private wealth, sooner or later significant differences between people will again emerge, if not with respect to their monetary income, then with respect to private wealth. And not surprisingly, these differences will steadily become more pronounced if a purely contractual inheritance law exists. Hence, social-democratic socialism, motivated as it is by egalitarian zeal, includes private wealth in its policy schemes and imposes a tax on it, too, and in particular imposes an inheritance tax in order to satisfy the popular outcry over "unearned riches" falling upon heirs.

Economically, these measures immediately reduce the amount of private wealth formation. As the enjoyment of private wealth is made relatively more costly by the tax, less wealth will be newly created, increased consumption will ensue —including that of existing stocks of nonproductively used riches— and the overall standard of living, which of course also depends on the comforts derived from private wealth, will sink.

Similar conclusions about impoverishment effects are reached when the third major field of tax policies —that of "natural assets"— is analyzed. For reasons to be discussed below, this field, next to the two traditional fields of monetary income and private wealth taxation, has gained more prominence over time under the heading of opportunity equalization. It did not take much to discover that a person's position in life does not depend exclusively on monetary income or the wealth of nonproductively used goods. There are other things that are important in life and which bring additional income, even though it may not be in the form of money or other exchange goods: a nice family, an education, health, good looks, etc. I will call these nonexchangeable goods from which (psychic) income can be derived "natural assets." Redistributive socialism, led by egalitarian ideals, is also irritated by existing differences in such assets, and tries, if not to eradicate, then at least to moderate them. But these assets, being nonexchangeable goods, can not be easily expropriated and the proceeds then redistributed. It is also not very practical, to say the least, to achieve this goal by directly reducing the nonmonetary income from natural assets of higher income people to the level of lower income people by, for instance, ruining the health of the healthy and so making them equal to the sick, or by smashing the good-looking people's faces to make them look like their less fortunate bad-looking fellows.\textsuperscript{12} Thus, the common method social-democratic socialism advocates in order to create "equality of opportunity" is taxation of natural assets. Those people who are thought to receive a relatively higher nonmonetary income from some asset, like health, are subject to an additional tax, to be paid in money. This tax is then redistributed to those people whose respective income is relatively low to help compensate them for this fact. An additional tax, for instance, is levied on the healthy to help the unhealthy pay their doctor bills, or on the good-looking to help the ugly pay for plastic surgery or to buy themselves a drink so that they can forget about their lot. The economic consequences of such redistributive schemes should be clear. Insofar as the psychic income, represented by health, for instance, requires some productive, time and cost-consuming effort, and as people can, in principle, shift from productive roles into nonproductive ones, or channel their productive efforts into different, non- or less heavily taxed lines of nonexchangeable or exchangeable goods production, they will do so because of the increased costs involved in the production of personal health. The overall production of the wealth in question will fall, the general standard of health, that is, will be reduced. And even with truly natural assets, like intelligence, about which people can admittedly do little or nothing, consequences of the same kind will result, though only with a time lag of one generation. Realizing that it has become relatively more costly to be intelligent and less so to be nonintelligent, and wanting as much income (of all sorts) as possible for one's offspring, the incentive for intelligent people to produce offspring has been lowered and for nonintelligent ones raised. Given the laws of genetics, the result will be a population that is all in all less intelligent. And besides, in any case of taxation of natural assets, true for the example of health as well as for that of intelligence, because monetary income is taxed, a tendency similar to the one resulting from income taxation will set in, i.e., a tendency to reduce one's efforts for monetary return and instead increasingly engage in productive activity for nonmonetary return or in all sorts of nonproductive enterprises. And, of course, all this once again reduces the general standard of living.

But this is still not all that has to be said about the consequences of socialism social-democratic-style, as it will also have remote yet nonetheless highly important effects on the social-moral structure of society, which will become visible when one considers the long-term effects of introducing redistributive policies. It probably no longer comes as a surprise that in this regard, too, the difference between Russian-type socialism and socialism social-democratic style, while highly interesting in some details, is not of a principal kind.

As should be recalled, the effect of the former on the formation of personality types was twofold, reducing the incentive to develop productive skills, and favoring at the same time the development of political talents. This precisely is also the overall consequence of social-democratic socialism. As social-democratic socialism favors nonproductive roles as well as productive ones that escape public notice and so cannot be reached by taxation, the character of the population changes accordingly. This process might be slow, but as long as the peculiar incentive structure established by redistributive policies lasts, it is constantly operative. Less investment in the development and improvement of one's productive skills will take place and, as a consequence, people will become increasingly unable to secure their income on their own, by producing or contracting. And as the degree of taxation rises and the circle of taxed income widens, people will increasingly develop personalities as inconspicuous, as uniform, and as mediocre as is possible—least as far as public appearance is concerned. At the same time, as a person's income simultaneously becomes dependent on politics, i.e., on society's decision on how to redistribute taxes (which is reached, to be sure, not by contracting, but rather by superimposing one person's will on another's recalcitrant one!), the more dependent it becomes, the more people will have to politicalize, i.e., the more time and energy they will have to invest in the development of their special talents for achieving personal advantages at the expense (i.e., in a noncontractual way) of others or of preventing such exploitation from occurring.

The difference between both types of socialism lies (only) in the following: under Russian-type socialism society's control over the means of production, and hence over the income produced with them, is complete, and so far there seems to be no more room to engage in political debate about the proper degree of politicalization of society. The issue is settled—ust as it is settled at the other end of the spectrum, under pure capitalism, where there is no room for politics at all and all relations are exclusively contractual. Under social-democratic socialism, on the other hand, social control over income produced privately is actually only partial, and increased or full control exists only as society's not yet actualized right, making only for a potential threat hanging over the heads of private producers. But living with the threat of being fully taxed rather than actually being so taxed explains an interesting feature of social-democratic socialism as regards the general development toward increasingly politicalized characters. It explains why under a system of social-democratic socialism the sort of politicalization is different from that under Russian-type socialism. Under the latter, time and effort is spent nonproductively, discussing how to distribute the socially owned income; under the former, to be sure, this is also done, but time and effort are also used for political quarrels over the issue of how large or small the socially administered income-shares should actually be. Under a system of socialized means of production where this issue is settled once and for all, there is then relatively more withdrawal from public life, resignation, and cynicism to be observed. Social-democratic socialism, on the other hand, where the question is still open, and where producers and nonproducers alike can still entertain some hope of improving their position by decreasing or increasing taxation, has less of such privatization and, instead, more often has people actively engaged in political agitation either in favor of increasing society's control of privately produced incomes, or against it.

With the general similarity as well as this specific difference between both types of socialism explained, the task remains of presenting a brief analysis of some modifying forces influencing the general development toward unproductive politicalized personalities. These are effected by differing approaches to the desirable pattern of income distribution. Russian and social-democratic socialism alike are faced with the question of how to distribute income that happens to be socially controlled. For Russian-type socialism it is a matter of what salaries to pay to individuals who have been assigned to various positions in the caretaker economy. For redistributive socialism it is the question of how much tax to allocate to whom. While there are in principle innumerable ways to do this, the egalitarian philosophy of both kinds of socialism effectively reduces the available options to three general types.

15 Traditionally, this approach has been favored, at least in theory, by orthodox Marxist socialism—in line with Marx' famous dictum in his "Critique of the Gotha Programme," (K. Marx, Selected Works, vol. 2, London, 1942, p.566), "from each according to his ability, to each according to his needs." Economic reality, however, has forced the Russian-style countries to make considerable concessions in practice. Generally speaking, an effort has indeed been made to equalize the (assumedly highly visible) monetary income for various occupations, but in order to keep the economy going, considerable difference in (assumedly less visible) nonmonetary rewards (such as special privileges regarding travel, education, housing, shopping, etc.) have had to be introduced.

Surveying the literature, P. Gregory and R. Stuart (Comparative Economic Systems, Boston, 1985), state:
approach reduces the incentive to work most drastically, for it no longer makes much difference —salary-wise—if one works diligently all day or fools around most of the time. Hence, disutility of labor being a fact of life, people will increasingly fool around, with the average income that everyone seems to be guaranteed constantly falling, in relative terms. Thus, this approach relatively strengthens the tendency toward withdrawal, disillusionment, cynicism, and mutatis mutandis, contributes to a relative reduction in the general atmosphere of politicalization. The second approach has the more moderate aim of guaranteeing a minimum income which, though normally somehow linked to average income, falls well below it.\footnote{This approach is traditionally most typical for social-democratic socialism. In recent years it has been given much publicized support—from the side of the economics profession—by Milton Friedman with his proposal for a "negative income tax" (Friedman, \textit{Capitalism and Freedom}, Chicago, 1962, Chapter 12); and by J. Rawls—from the philosophical side—with his "difference principle" (Rawls, \textit{A Theory of Justice}, Cambridge, 1971, pp.60, 75 ff, 83). Accordingly, both authors have received much attention from social-democratic party intellectuals. Generally, Friedman was only found "guilty" of not wanting to set the minimum income high enough— but then, he had no principled criterion for setting it at any specific point anyway. Rawls, who wants to coerce the "most advantaged person" into letting the "least advantaged one" share in his fortune whenever he happens to improve his own position, was at times even found to have gone too far with his egalitarianism. Cf. G. Schwan, \textit{Sozialismus in der Demokratie. Theorie einer konsequent sozialdemokratischen Politik}, Stuttgart, 1982, Chapter 3. D.} This, too, reduces the incentive to work, since, to the extent that they are only marginal income producers with incomes from production only slightly above the minimum, people will now be more inclined to reduce or even stop their work, enjoy leisure instead, and settle for the minimum income. Thus more people than otherwise will fall below the minimum line, or more people than otherwise will keep or acquire those characteristics on whose existence payment of minimum salaries is bound, and as a consequence, again, the average income to which the minimum salary is linked will fall below the level that it otherwise would have reached. But, of course, the incentive to work is reduced to a smaller degree under the second than the first scheme. On the other hand, the second approach will lead to a relatively higher degree of active politicalization (and less of resigned withdrawal), because, unlike average income, which can be objectively ascertained, the level at which the minimum income is fixed is a completely subjective, arbitrary affair, which is thus particularly prone to becoming a permanent political issue.

C'est certainement lorsqu'on choisit la troisième approche redistributive que l'on atteint le plus haut degré de politisation active. Son objectif, de plus en plus influent dans la social-démocratie, est d'atteindre l'égalité des chances\textsuperscript{17}. L'idée est de créer, par des mesures redistributives, une situation dans laquelle les chances pour chacun d'atteindre n'importe quelle situation sociale au cours de sa vie seraient "égales" —tout à fait comme dans une loterie où chaque billet a la même chance de gagner ou de perdre— et, en plus de cela, d'avoir un mécanisme correcteur qui aide à rectifier les situations de "malchance imméritée" (quelque sens qu'on puisse donner à cela) qui pourraient se produire au cours de ce processus aléatoire continu. Prise littéralement, bien sûr, l'idée est absurde: il n'existe aucun moyen d'"égaliser les chances" entre quelqu'un qui vit dans les Alpes et quelqu'un qui vit au bord de la mer. En plus de cela, il semble bien clair que l'idée d'un mécanisme compensateur est tout simplement incompatible avec celle d'une loterie. Pourtant, c'est précisément ce degré élevé de confusion et de vague qui contribue à rendre populaire le concept. Ce qu'est une "chance", ce qui rend les chances différentes ou égales, moins bonnes ou meilleures, quelle compensation il faut et sous quelle forme pour "égaliser les chances" dont on avoue qu'elles ne peuvent pas l'être physiquement (comme dans le cas des Alpes et du bord de la mer), ce qu'est une "malchance imméritée" et ce qui la rectifierait, toutes ces questions sont parfaitement arbitraires. Elles dépendent d'évaluations subjectives, aussi changeantes que possible et nous avons alors —si on prend au sérieux le concept d'"égalité des chances"— un inépuisable trésor de prétextes pour exiger une redistribution, pour toutes sortes de raisons et pour toutes sortes de personnes. C'est notamment le cas parce qu'"égaliser les chances" permet de réclamer des différences de revenu monétaire ou de richesse privée. Untel et Tartempion peuvent bien avoir le même revenu ou la même fortune, mais Untel peut être noir, ou une femme, ou avoir mauvaise vue, ou habiter le Texas, ou avoir dix enfants, ou n'avoir pas de mari, ou avoir plus de 65 ans, alors que Tartempion peut n'être rien de tout cela mais quelque chose d'autre, et par conséquent Untel pourrait bien affirmer que ses chances d'arriver à quelque chose —n'importe quoi— dans la vie sont différentes de celles de Tartempion, et qu'il a "droit" à une compensation conséquente, de manière à ce que leurs revenus monétaires, auparavant les mêmes, soient désormais différents. Quant à Tartempion, naturellement, il n'a qu'à inverser l'évaluation des "chances" que cela implique pour avoir exactement la même exigence dans l'autre sens. La conséquence est qu'un degré inouï de politisation s'ensuivra. Tout est désormais permis, et les producteurs comme les non-producteurs, les premiers dans un but défensif et les seconds dans un but d'agression, seront conduits à dépenser de plus en plus de temps à évoquer, réfuter ou combattre des exigences de redistribution. Et bien entendu, cette activité n'est pas seulement improductive comme le sont les loisirs mais, en contraste avec eux, elle implique de consacrer du temps à troubler la libre disposition des biens produits comme à entraver la production de nouvelles richesses.

\textsuperscript{17} Un exemple représentatif d'une recherche d'inspiration démocrate-sociale sur l'égalité des chances" se trouve chez Ch. Jencks et al., \textit{Inequality}, Londres, 1973 ; la domination croissante de l'idée d'"égaliser les chances" explique aussi l'invasion d'études sociologiques sur la "qualité de la vie" et autres "indicateurs sociaux" qui est apparue à la fin des années 1960 Cf., par exemple, A. Szalai et F. Andrews (eds.), \textit{The Quality of Life}, Londres, 1980.

Cependant, l'idée d'"égaliser les chances" ne fait pas que stimuler la politisation (au-delà du niveau généralement impliqué par les autres formes de socialisme). C'est peut-être un des traits les plus intéressants du nouveau socialisme social-démocrate si on le compare à sa forme marxiste plus traditionnelle, qu'elle imprime à cette politisation un caractère nouveau et différent. Toute politique de distribution doit avoir une clientèle pour la promouvoir et la défendre. Normalement, quoiqu'il n'en soit pas exclusivement ainsi, elle est faite de ceux qui en profitent le plus. Ainsi, dans un système d'égalisation des revenus et des patrimoines, comme dans celui d'une politique de revenu minimum, ce sont principalement les pauvres qui soutiennent la politisation de la vie sociale. Comme ils se trouvent en moyenne faire partie de ceux dont les capacités intellectuelles et notamment verbales sont relativement faibles, cela conduit à une vie politique qui manque singulièrement de raffinement intellectuel, pour rester modéré*. En gros, la vie politique tend à être parfaitement ennuyeuse, stupide et atterrante, au jugement même d'un nombre considérable des pauvres eux-mêmes. A l'inverse, si on adopte l'idée d'"égaliser les chances", les différences de revenu monétaire et de patrimoine deviennent licites et même assez accentuées, pourvu qu'on puisse les justifier par quelque "déséquilibre" dans la structure des chances, que les inégalités susmentionnées seraient là pour compenser. Dans cette arène politique-là, les riches eux aussi peuvent prendre leur part. En fait, comme ils sont en général ceux qui parlent le mieux, et comme imposer sa définition de ce qu'est une chance bonne ou mauvaise est largement une question d'aptitude à la rhétorique, c'est précisément le genre de jeu pour lequel ils sont les mieux placés. Ainsi, les riches deviennent-

* Une autre conséquence possible - et peut-être plus probable - du fait que, comme le disait Reiser : "les pauvres sont des cons", serait que les pauvres en question se feront constamment gruger, de sorte que le seul égalitarisme des résultats soit suffisant pour qu'on se retrouve avec une structure redistributive qui vole les pauvres au profit de beaucoup plus riches qu'eux : rien n'est plus facile que d'énumérer des politiques qui agissent de la sorte alors que les politiciens prétendent - et que l'opinion croit dur comme fer - que c'est l'inverse. Outre la pseudo-gratuité de l'enseignement supérieur, c'est aussi le cas de la retraite par répartition, du salaire minimum, du protectionnisme agricole, du logement dit "social", des subventions aux transports en commun... Pour des exemples américains, cf. David Friedman : "Robin des Bois est un vendu" dans Vers une société sans Etat. Paris, les Belles Lettres, 1991. ils le principal élément de la politisation. Ce seront de plus en plus des hommes issus de leurs rangs qui accéderont au sommet de l'appareil socialiste et changeront en conséquence l'aspect et le discours de la vie politique sous le socialisme. Elle deviendra de plus en plus intellectualisée, changeant ses moyens de séduction pour attirer de nouveaux types d'adhérents...

L'exemple le plus instructif, pourrait être fourni par l'Allemagne et, cettefous-ci, par l'Allemagne de l'Ouest18. Entre 1949 et 1966 elle avait un gouvernement libéral-conservateur qui faisait preuve d'un attachement remarquable aux principes d'une économie de marché, même s'il y avait dès le départ une dose considérable de protectionnisme socialiste-conservateur et si cet élément devait croître avec le temps. En tous cas, de toutes les grandes nations européennes pendant cette période, la République Fédérale fut certainement le pays le plus capitaliste.

Le résultat fut qu'elle devint la société la plus prospère d'Europe, avec des taux de croissance qui surpassaient ceux de tous ses voisins. Jusqu'en 1961, des millions de réfugiés allemands, et ensuite des millions de travailleurs étrangers venus des pays d'Europe du sud s'intégrèrent dans son économie en croissance, alors que le chômage comme l'inflation y étaient presque inconnus. Puis, après une brève période de transition, de 1969 à 1982 (presque une durée égale) une coalition des socialistes et des "libéraux" prit le pouvoir, dirigée par les sociauxdémocrates. Elle augmenta considérablement les impôts et les "cotisations" de "sécurité sociale", augmenta le nombre des fonctionnaires et la masse d'argent public allant aux programmes sociaux existants, en créa de nouveaux, et accru substantiellement les dépenses pour toutes sortes de prétendus "services collectifs", soi-disant pour "égaliser les chances" et "accroître globalement la qualité de la vie". Par le biais d'une politique keynésienne de déficit budgétaire et d'inflation non anticipée, on put retarder pendant quelques années les effets d'un accroissement des prestations "sociales" minimum garanties aux non-producteurs aux dépens des producteurs plus lourdement taxés. Le slogan de politique économique du Chancelier Helmut Schmidt était à l'époque : "plutôt 5 % d'inflation que 5 % de chômage". Ces effets ne devraient pourtant en être que plus spectaculaires puisque l'inflation de crédit non anticipée avait créé et prolongé un sur- ou plutôt un mal-investissement typique de ce genre de politique. En conséquence, il n'y eut pas seulement beaucoup plus que 5 % d'inflation : le chômage augmenta constamment jusqu'à atteindre 10 %. La croissance du PNB se ralentit de plus en plus jusqu'à ce qu'il décline en termes absolus pendant les dernières années de la période. A la place d'une 18 Sur ce qui suit cf. aussi R. Merklein, Griff in die eigene Tasche, Hamburg, 1980 ; et Die Deutschen werden ärmer, économie en expansion, on vit baisser le nombre absolu des personnes employées. On exerça des pressions croissantes sur les travailleurs étrangers pour leur faire quitter le pays et renforça constamment les barrières contre l'immigration. Pendant tout ce temps, l'économie souterraine croissait constamment en importance.

Il ne s'agit cependant ici que des effets "économiques" au sens étroit. Il y en eut d'autres, de nature différente, et dont l'importance est en fait plus durable. Avec la nouvelle coalition socialiste-"libérale" l'idée d'"égaliser les chances" fut mise sur le devant de la scène. Et comme nous l'avons prédit à partir de l'analyse théorique, ce fut en particulier la diffusion officielle du slogan "Mehr Demokratie wagen" ("Oser plus de démocratie", au début l'un des slogans les plus populaires de l'ère Willy Brandt) qui conduisit à un degré de politisation jusqu'alors inconnu. On avançait toutes sortes de réclamations au nom de l'"égalité des chances" et il n'y eut guère de domaine de l'existence, de l'enfance jusqu'au troisième âge, des loisirs aux conditions de travail, qui ne fût examiné avec ferveur pour découvrir quelles différences il recelait pour différentes personnes en ce qui concerne les "chances" définies comme pertinentes. Inutile de dire que des "chances" et des "inégalités" de cette sorte, on en découvrait constamment ; en conséquence, le domaine de la politique s'étendait presque tous les jours. "Tout est politique", entendait-on dire de plus en plus souvent. Pour rester à la hauteur de ces changements, il fallut aussi que les partis politiques changeassent à leur tour. Le parti social-démocrate en particulier, traditionnellement parti d'ouvriers, dut mettre au point une nouvelle image. Comme l'idée d'"égaliser les chances" se développait, il devint de plus en plus, comme on aurait pu le prévoir, le parti de l'intelligentsia (du verbe), des sociologues et des enseignants. Et comme pour prouver qu'un processus de politisation sera principalement animé par ceux qui sont le mieux à même de profiter de ses distributions, et que la tâche d'"égaliser les chances" est essentiellement affaire d'arbitraire et de langue bien pendue, ce "nouveau" parti s'attache principalement à mobiliser les diverses forces politiques mises en branle autour du projet d'"égaliser les chances" en matière d'éducation. En particulier, ils "égalisèrent" les chances d'aller au lycée puis à l'université, non seulement en offrant les services en question sans les faire payer mais en distribuant littéralement de l'argent aux étudiants pour qu'ils y aillent. Cela n'augmenta pas seulement la demande d'éducateurs, d'enseignants et de sociologues, qu'il fallut naturellement payer par l'impôt. De manière assez paradoxale pour un parti socialiste qui prétendait qu'"égaliser les chances à l'école" impliquerait un transfert de ressources des riches vers les pauvres, cela revient aussi à une subvention payée aux plus intelligents aux dépens des moins intelligents, forcés de payer l'impôt. Et, dans la mesure où il y a plus de gens intelligents dans les classes moyennes et supérieures que chez les autres, il s'agit d'un transfert forcé des pauvres vers les riches\(^{20}\). Mené par un nombre croissant d'"enseignants" payés par l'impôt et tenant sous leur coupe un nombre croissant d'étudiants, ce processus de politisation eut l'effet qu'on pouvait prédire : on assista à un changement dans la mentalité des gens. De plus en plus, on considéra qu'il était parfaitement normal de satisfaire toutes sortes de besoins par des moyens politiques, et d'invoquer de prétendus "droits" sur d'autres personnes supposées mieux loties et sur leur propriété. Pour toute une génération élevée pendant cette période, il devint de moins en moins naturel de songer à améliorer son sort par l'effort productif et par l'engagement contractuel. Ainsi, quand la crise économique provoquée par cette politique distributive fut bel et bien là, les gens étaient plus mal équipés que jamais pour la surmonter, parce qu'au cours de la même période, cette politique avait précisément affaibli les compétences et les talents dont on avait alors le plus besoin. Ce qui est instructif c'est que lorsque le gouvernement social-démocrate fut chassé en 1982, principalement parce que ses résultats économiques étaient évidemment lamentables, l'opinion prévalait encore qu'on devait résoudre la crise non en éliminant ses causes, à savoir le gonflement des prestations minimum en faveur des non-producteurs vivant sur le dos des autres, mais par une autre mesure redistributive: en égalisant par le force le nombre d'heures de travail disponible entre les personnes employées et les chômeurs. Conformément à cet état d'esprit, le nouveau gouvernement conservateur ne fit pas non plus davantage que ralentir la croissance des impositions.
